- The user interface shall be able to rotate 360 degrees for optimal ergonomics in the clinical environment.
- Direct access and additional ventilation settings shall be easily accessible on the user interface.
- When setting parameters on the user interface, there shall be a safety mechanism which prevents the user from inadvertent setting of extreme potentially hazardous values.
- The user interface shall include dynamic images, graphics and information texts that explain ventilation modes, and settings such as different trigger types, end inspiration and inspiratory rise time.
- The user interface shall include quick access to descriptions and graphics of each ventilation mode.
- The user interface shall be able to show at least five real-time graphic waveforms, which are color coded with the related numeric parameters on the screen.
- It shall be possible to choose different user interface layouts (e.g. basic, advanced, loops and distance views)
- The user interface shall include a friendly neutral (family) view which only shows the key numerical parameters in order to reduce the stress when relatives are visiting the ward.
- The user interface shall include possibility to store (40) screen dumps and (40) recorded ventilation sequences.
- The user interface shall include a media library which enables quick export of screenshots and recordings to a USB-stick.
- It shall be easy to copy the configuration from one system to another system through export of configurations to a USB-stick.
